Old Battle Site For Museum

By WILKIE RASMUSSEN

An ancestor who fought in a battle between Maori warriors and British troops 125 years ago has prompted an Auckland man to lay plans for a museum.

Mr Pat Gaitely, of Takapuna, plans to build the one-storey museum on a small island in the Waikato River, just north of Hamilton, where the Battle of Rangiriri took place.

"I thought it might be a good way to remember that part of New Zealand history," he said.

Mr Gaitely bought the island two years ago.

He said the idea for the museum came because his great-grandfather Colonel Robert Leslie took part in the 1863 battle.

He said it would be a place to display publicly artefacts from the 1800s which he had collected over the past 40 years.

The artefacts included uniforms worn by British troops during the battle which killed 38 Maori warriors from the Waikato and 47 soldiers.

● The battle lasted several days and ended when the Maoris surrendered on November 20, 1863.

Coins survive time

Thirteen old coins have been discovered in one of two bottles dug up in a 109-year-old time capsule in Auckland.

The coins include a penny, a half penny, a crown, a half crown, a sovereign, a shilling, a sixpence, a florin, a tuppence and a farthing.

The other coins had a hole punched through them and cannot be identified.

The copper coins have corroded, but the others are in good order.

The contents of the second bottle have been destroyed by water because of a broken seal.

The time capsule was planted under the foundation stone of the Masonic Lodge in Princes St with mayoral pomp and ceremony 109 years ago, and was unearthed last week during the redevelopment of a building.

In honour of its planting, on March 31, 1881, a grandstand was built, the mayor of Auckland invited and freemasons, including some from Waikato, gathered.

The New Zealand Herald that day said it was "a day that would be remembered as an epoch in masonry in this province."

The capsule and its contents will be displayed in the foyer of the new building, to be known as the Peat Marwick Centre.
